The Week Opens With Gloom. The Week Opens With Gloom.

The news from Long Branch this morning was of the gloomiest and most depressing character, and all indications point to the fact that the President is now passing through a crisis which in his low state he may not be able to overcome. During yesterday he was comparatively quiet and comfortable, but last night he had another chill, and the physicians, although they have not abandoned all hope, speak in very descondent terms. A dispatch from Long Branch dated last

A dispatch from Long Branch dated last evening says:

"This morning was looked forward to with undoubtedly more anxiety than any morning since his arrival here, but the morning bulletin was not on the whole satisfactory, although those persons who have allowed their hopes and desires to get the better of their judgment professed to derive much comfort from it. The surgeons, when approached, would shake their heads as they repeated the old saying: 'He is doing nicely and there is no material change.' As the day progressed and it became known that the temperature had gone up to 100, hope partially revived, and those who would have regarded his temperature three days ago as indicative of danger, accepted it as evidence of improvement, in that it showed that all vitality was not gone, but that there was still some left for the fever to feed upon. The evening bulletin was regarded as Remarkable Only for its Omissions and not for what it said. Attorney-General MacVeagh, in commenting upon the bulletin said: 'There is nothing affirmative in it. It is all negative, and must be read in that light.' Within an hour after the bulletin was issued Dan, the colored servant, who assists about the President's room, came running across to the surgeon's cottage, and said that the President had had another chill. Dr. Bliss was at supper at the time, but word was quickly conveyed to him and he repaired to the President's cottage in a hurried manner. Among the first to hear of the rigor was Attorney-General MacVeagh, who went at once to ascertain if the report was true. He cameback to the Elberon in a few minutes and said it was so, but the rigor was a light one, not lasting over ten minutes, and that it had then (7:30 p. m.) entirely passed off. It was not until two hours later that Dr. Bliss made his appearance and gave his usual daily interview to the correspondents."

The Hopeful Growing Despondent.

The Hopeful Growing Despondent The most significant part of Dr. Bliss' re-marks was the want of confidence expressed marks was the want of confidence expressed in the President's final recovery. He now frankly acknowledged that the chances are strongly against the President ever getting well, but said the surgeons would fight for the little chance remaining. Attorney-General MacVeagh said late to-night that he was practically without hope, and that it was now purely a question of time when death would occur. The President has not, he said, rallied from the rigor of yesterday. There has been a reaction from the chill. he said, rallied from the rigor of yesterday. There has been a reaction from the chill, but this is totally different from rallying and getting back to where he was when the chill came on. He said he could get little or no comfort from the surgeons, and he could see nothing but gloom. He said he had not summoned the Cabinet back here, as reported; that those who had gone to the White Mountains had arranged to return vesterday. He here, as reported; that those who had gone to the White Mountains had arranged to return yesterday. He had telegraphed them on Friday that he was gratified to know that their plans were such as to bring them here yesterday, as the President was much worse. The news of the rigor to-night was conveyed to the Cabinet by a telegram from Attorney-General MacVeagh about 8 p. m. They immediately took carriages and drove to the Elberon to get full particulars of the situation. They got little encouragement, and all spoke despondingly about the prospect. After remaining here a few minutes they proceeded to Attorney-General MacVeagh's cottage, where they remained until a late hour. A friend of Dr. Agnew, of large experience in surgical cases, had a talk with him to-day about the case, when Dr. Agnew said he was convinced that the rigor yesterday was caused by lung trouble. He could not tell, he said, as yet whether other complications would follow or not. The surgeon said he did not think Dr. Agnew was correct; that in his opinion the rigor was the result of the ball not being seesysted. The trouble on the lung shows no indication of passing off, and while the physical cains cannot ascertain that the rigors are due to new local complications, they represent at least an aggravation of the present symptoms. A fourth rigor, it is reported.

"The dispatch sent to Minister Lowell to-night by Attorney-General MacVeagh represents not only his individual views, but those of his associates, who talked the case over very fully in the presence of Dr. Boynton. Not apprehend an immediate death, but feel confident they can sustain life for some time yet. Colonel Rockwell, who has been the most enthusiastic and confident of the President's recovery of any of his attendants, is greatly weakened in his faith to night. This afternoon, believing the President was doing nicely, he went with a friend to dine with Mr. John Hoey, and knew nothing of the chill until his return. He sent a discouraging message from the seick-room to-night. Gen. Swnim, who was with the President during the afternoon and until a late hour to-night, has not much hope left, and is discouraged because, in spite of all the efforts to build up the President's strength since he came here, he has constantly grown weaker. The President's cottage was closed shortly before 11 o'clock, and the amouncement made that no further information would be given out to-night. At 12 o'clock all was still about the Elberon, and only the night watchman on duty and a few newspaper correspondents were about the hotel office."

The dispatch'of Mr. MacVeagh, referred to in the above, was as follows:

"The President passed a comparatively quiet and comfortable day, but this evening he had another chill of less duration than that of yesterday, but sufficient to increase the very great anxiety already existing. He has also been slowly growing weaker, and his present condition excites the gravest apprehensions."

Another Account of the Rigor.

The correspondent of the National Republican sent the following last night:

"The President had another chill at about half-past 7 this evening, lasting from fifteen to twenty minutes. The pulse went up to 134, falling again to 120.

The chill was followed by profuse perspiration. Dr. Bliss described it as being short and sharp. He stated further that the measures he had been using to prevent the chills had probably tended to modify its severity. He had detected symptoms of an approaching disturbance of some kind earlier in the evening. When the chill made its appearance, therefore, he was not surprised. Speaking of the probabilities for the rest of the night, he said he auticipated a gradual decline of the pulse, and thought that at midnight it would be down to 104 or 108, with a temperature about normal and respiration at 18 or 20.

Dr. Bliss Manuser was That of a Mass

Dr. Bliss' Manner was That of a Man who, if not despondent, was certainly much depressed. Rocking himself forward and backward in his chair, he said in a soliloquizing manner: 'We are beginning our twelfth week to-night. In the twelve weeks,' he continued, 'there has been crowded a lifetime of surgical skill and experience. It has been a terrible struggle. No one outside that sick room will ever know what a fight it has been. But there is this about it,' he added, after a moment's silence, 'none of my patients were ever buried before they died.' Sylvester Everett, of Cleveland, Ohio, a long-time personal friend of Garfield, who lately came here in buoyant spirits, spent several hours in Prancklyn College this afternoon. He said to a friend this evening; 'There can be but one ending to this case, and that is gradual dissolution. It may last a week; it may last not more than two or three days.' In his conversation with the press this evening, in answer to an inquiry to what he specially attributed these chills, Dr. Bliss said that he attributed them to the condition of the lungs.

His system has been so affected by the blood poisoning that it now seems impossible for him to have even such changes in his condition as ought to be affected by a rigor. It would seem that he is too low to be affected any longer by anything one way or another."

No Signs of Recovery.

Long Branch, Sept. 19—9:45 a. m.—
Dr. Bliss spoke very frankly this morning.
He said the President was very low, and showed no signs of recovery. The chill this morning had been quite severe; about the same as last night. The chills are to be expected now at any time, and their continuance must end fatally.

He could not foretell the course of the disease. Death, if it comes, would probably be from exhaustion, and would not be sudden. The temperature at the chill just over was very threatening. They were, of course, doing what they could to modify the severity of the chills and the suffering of the patient. The blood poisoning, however, was evidently present in a pronounced degree.

Dr. Bliss has just made a statement as to the origin and progress of the President's lung trouble. He said:

"The lung trouble began with a hypostatic congestion which was caused in part by being in a recumbent position, and because the side was impaired by the wound."

Their attention was directed to the lung weeks are. They carefully examined it.

Their attention was directed to the lung weeks ago. They carefully examined it frequently, both by osculation and percussion, and found the area and extent of the field of duliness. This was previous to the suppuration of the parotid gland. The parotid swelling created an inflammation, which extended from the gland to the mucus membrane of the throat and larnyx and affective of the procedure as and afterward invaded the bronchical pas-sages and was attracted to the right lung rather than to the left because the injury was on that side and there was a slight congestion there. many was on that sine and there was a slight congestion there. No Evidence of Repair To-day, But no Immediate Emergency.
Special Dispatch to The Events Carric.

Long Branch, N. J., Sept. 19—12:30, p. m.—At noon Dr. Bliss said: "There is no immediate emergency in the present condition. The President called for a handsid safer the dressing this morning and said: 'I cannot understand why I am so weak when I look so well.' His voice is not as hoarse as it was when the parotid gland was inflamed. There is no evidence of repair this morning in any of the wounds. The discharge from the wound is thin and a little stringy. Still the President is quite cheerful. The left lung seems to be only slightly affected."

A Cabinet Council.

Elberon, Sept. 19—12:35 p. m.—The President is now asleep. Secretary Lincoln has arrived and a Cabinet council is in progress. The members have been in session for a half an hour. All the members are present except Mr. Blaine.

Elberon, Sept. 19—1p. m.—The President reacted so rapidly from this morning's chill that within thirty minutes his pulse has fallen to 118.

There is an emergency in the President's case for which we must be prepared.

How the find News Was Received Here.

The street scenes to-day were intensely exciting. At all points where bulletins were displayed crowds assembled. There were eager, anxious throngs in the vicinity of the newspaper and telegraph offices, and on every side people were heard asking for late news from the President. The prevailing opinion was that there was no longer any hope for the President, and his death was only a matter of a few hours. At a late hour the populace was anxiously waiting, believing the next news from Long Branch would be the announcement of the President's death. At the White House information was received that the President's condition was critical.

Similar news was received by heads of the Desertment.

ceived that the President's condition was critical.

Similar news was received by heads of the Departments. In the latter institutions very little business was transacted. The clerks were too auxious to hear from Long Branch, and business was a second consideration. There was a feeling decidedly hostile towards file physicians to-day, and those responsible for the President's removal from this city to Long Branch were emphatically denounced. Some talk was prevalent also with reference to the assarcin Guiteau, threats of lynching him having been heard in a number of places. Such a demonstration, however, is not likely, as the jail is very strongly guarded by a force of sufficient strength to keep off a mob.
